HARRIS, WILLIAM L., BISHOP

Bishop William Logica II was D.D., H.D. was bone near Gallion, O. November a 1817, as I but a New York site September 2, 1887, and was, as a fractional figure stay years of age. In 18-4 he was converted a lapticate of Charle of the computer ingressible and live the R. v. Heaty O. Slebbon. State could Green be was necreed into tall corresponds to the Rev. John T. Kellam,

Soon give his conversion in entered New ak Semanny, where he remained two vers paying his way by saving wood lighting the flas in Frieging the left or that its action

After leaving the seminary he is aghit for eshort time a district school non-Norwick, O — it has independent ve a he was becaused to preach, ind September 6-18-17, be join a to. Muchigan Conference, which then included the normal portain er Omo.

After leaving served several years in the pastorate he was elected, in 1845, a terrer in it. Object Westevan University, and after a service of two years into a the pastorate he become, in 1848, principal of what is now the Baldwin University. In 1851 he was tutor in Ohio Westeyn, University. In 1859 he was elected in the same institution to the double chair of Chemistry and Natural History, which position he held for eight years

In 1860 he was elected by the Carried Conference one of the Secretaries of the Missionary Society was recleiced in 1803 and in 1868, holding the position for twile years. He was Secretary of the General Conference from 1866 to 1872. In 1872 he was elected Bishop and continued in this high office until September 2, 1887, where earth closed his earthly thous

Bishop He is served the Church is poster, teacher, Missionary Secretary, and Bishop. He was time years a pastor, four centar teacher, tycle it Missiophy Scotting, and fifteen a bishop, As a poster le aves successful, not because of any one distinguishmer te iture or anality of mind, heart, and work, but because of a has sweeppler year of the qualities saited to this most important received to the Charch. He was a close student of human fature, and readily and thoroughly to come accounted with the people be served. The was in lively sympathy with the yearse people and was gried with deal sould anomation, ad magnetism. His and seem from a transfer against the manifest the business and frameto mer ete o les entres. They are a less the proprintnon-terms pead rate in our stantage and proving the word. The region of the samples of common a continuously power. It is so that make been ages to the combineres were form of the control of the first second to the Configura and the same street and relax of these were to short I in this some of whom reading auto the day

Proble Harrs always placed a very handle estimate upon his abilities is a preacher. It would not be stronge it this estimate discourage to the null assorbing intention and effect necessary to possible preacency. But there is no direct true to the first underestimated the measure of his powers and the practical value of his manastry. As a preacher he was always thoughtful, earnest, examplified, and instructive. In clearness of statement, directness of can and in fortifying his positions by the application of sparrer, texts, he was not excelled.

As so that and as a teacher in our institutions of learning he is waitly of very favorable mention. Technically speaking, he was not what men of letters call a scholar. But while it was not possible for finit to be completely given to scholarly methods he darys had at command the best practical results of scholarship.

Though he had not the advantages of a collegiate training, and was never graduated from any college, he supplied this lack by the most possion study of the college curriculum, at such odd hours and days as he could save from professional duty, until he well mastered all its subjects. His powers of acquisition were very given, his perceptions were quick and clear, his memory wonderfully retentive and his reasoning close and correct. Few more could more readily master the central idea of a subject, and, when recessory, acquaint themselves more fully with its details.

His even methods of study gave cast to his work as a teacher. He strove to make his students comprehend principles, the controlling and outlining ideas of a subject, its general scope and drift, rather than to make a statement of recorded faces or of unapplied details. He was emphatically an educator, be led out or drew out the student's powers and helped lem to definite and clear conception; to express the same in his own language, and stimulate him to independent effect and original investigation. But in his work as a teacher the scholar and method were not equal to the near—the personality. His every and force of character were never more manifest and moding than in those days when he daily went in and out before large classes of young men.

He was the picture of health and personification of courage. As one of less structus once wrote of him: "He was a very whirlwind of activity." He seemed the hving representative of energy, force, conquering push, and irresistible effort. He was never popular with the lizy student, but he was an inspiration a decise, and in uphiting power to the carnest and industrious. His sympathy with higher education and with young people, his tact in caching, his delight in the growth of mand and in the development of character, in the the work of instruction a great present to him. He has often been heard to remark that the since of his connection with our justifier in soft learning was the rest edges on period or his lefe.

it is accept success as a sure source of pleasure, it would seem that the societieal work and period of his life ought to have been aistracted to a sacsfaction to house!! He was right years Societies of the North Ohio Conference, and afroward of the Conference autilities of the Church arely had an ideal General Conference Secretary when he came ato office. His great frame and great endurance, his powerful

576

We doubt whether the Church at large has fully appreciated, ϕ could fully appreciate, the services he rendered as Wassiemary Sec retary. In presenting the claims of the Society to the Annual Conferences he was called to take the place of Dr Durbin, the ideal organizer of the nessionary spirit and endossasm of the Church and the matchless pulpit and platform orator. But in adaptability to all the demands of this great office there has been no secretary superior to Dr. Harris. His unweared industry, sound judgment, knowledge of men, of methods, and of promis ing fields of effort, his business sugarity and accuracy, his comprehensive and lucid reports to the Missionary Committee, and his clear, crisp statements or explanations of facts and of reasons for or against pending propositions, were invaluable to the Church and could be appreciated only by those having knowledge of the needs and specific work of the Missionary Society. I think it may be safely said that no man in the whole lustory of the Church ever had a fuller knowledge of our many missionary fields, and no one ever so fully established a personal connection between them and the home Church.

Into the Episcopal office Bishop Havis brought mental-qualities and a discipline of mind peculiarly fitted for the work of a General Superintendent. The ability he possessed for the office and the services he rendered in it were well defined. He was a man emphatically of one work in the office. To the work to which the Church had called him he gave all his time and talent. He did not simply give preference, but also all his strength to purely official duties. The many, manifold, and exacting demands necessarily made of a chief pastor led him as a rule to decline all invitations to perform unofficial services. In this high office he particularly excelled as an administrator and a parliamentarian. In earing for and directing the general interests of the Church the legal cast of his mind became more pre-eminently manifest.

Any analysis of the powers of Bishop Harris would be very incomplete without special reference to this. It was often remarked, especially in his carlier activities, that nature seemed to have designed him for the profession of law. After entering the ministry he read the standard authorities in law literature and a quared a knowledge that greatly served him and subserved the rat rosts of the while Chench, as his alministrative career and less yeak an exclosion of law fully prove. His ability to grasp both principles and details were nowhere better diastrated than in his knowl dge of law, both constitutional and statutory, civil and e clesiestical. He insisted on definite legislation and the combodiment of essential principles in law forms, and then, which is much more, in a faithful application of these principles. His accurite knowledge of law and his studied application of its principles were recognized by the entire Church, and gave him exceptional influence as a counselor, legislator, and administrator.

His knowledge of ecclesiastical and parliamentary law seemed complete and always at his command. In this he was an authority long before he came into the Episcopacy. Perhaps no one was ever more at home in the presidency of a great deliberative body or in watching and sharing in its proceedings. He was especially indemand when a crisis, a tangle, a dilemma, or a delicate and rugged difficulty required an exposition of law or the citation of precedents. His aptness in this regard sometimes saved the Church from much disturbing debate and needless controversy.

Yet it does not follow that he was always the happiest presiding officer. His natural love for controversy, his intense interest in debate, something like impatience at the ignorance and misstatements of participants, and his own clear convictions and conclusions led him sometimes to lose sight of his relations as a judge and to mainfest the qualities of an advocate.

Bishop Harris was a man of decided and clear convictions. In them he was always definite, positive, powerful, and uncompromising. He always knew, and those associated with him always knew, what he believed and desired. Sometimes he thundered forth his convictions with marvelous emphasis. Because he saw so clearly be believed it his duty to make others see and to obey, not him, but the truth. The clearness of his conceptions, the strength of his convictions, and the earnestness of his advocacy sometimes gave the appearance of abruptness in manner and quickness in temper; but his transparency, integrity, and generosity always showed in the end the greatness of his soul, the kindliness of his sympathies, and the warmth of his friendship. His Christianity was of a manly type. It was a religion of principles rather than of manifested emotions. In my earlier acquaintance with him it did not seem to me that his massive form and strength, his positive and mental tendencies, his authoritative disposition, and his exuberant spirits were under the full control of divine grace; but when I saw, as it was my privilege, his home life, heard him pray at his family altar, and learned the motives that controlled his conduct in his daily life, then I well knew the thoroughness of his consecration and depth of his spirituality.

Bishop Harris belonged to three Annual Conferences, and yet was never transferred. His itinerant ministry covered half a century.

September 6, 1837, he entered the traveling connection in the Michigan Conference, and September 6, 1887, he was borne to the place appointed for all the living.

In 1886 the North Ohio and Central Ohio Conferences invited him to hold their sessions in 1887 and celebrate with them the send-centennial of his ministry. His colleagues sympathized with the request and kindly arranged his work accordingly. During the intervening months he looked forward to the approvidentially opportunt. Not to writings of his early ministry gratefully awaited his coming. The North Ohio Conference was to hold its session at Garena, which is within six miles of the place of his birth, stands on the very spot where he was converted, and formed a part of the old energy apon which he was heensed to preach. In writing to a triend and accepting the hospitalities of his house he said: "I cannot express the satisfaction with which I anticipate a visit to your town."

But life is largely made up of unexpected changes and sudden transitions. He had spent the summer abroad in rest and reeuperation and seemingly had gained much—But suddenly an alarming telegram comes from beyond the sea, a few days of dreadful suspense intervene while the homeward voyage is accomplished. When he reached his home then his family, his friends, and the Church breathed more easily. But it was soon apparent that an all-wise Providence had brought hun home simply that he might say "good-bye" to those he loved best, and in their presence pass triumphantly into his rest

In some respects Bishop Harris holds a unique place in our history as a Church. It is no disparagement to others to say that, in knowledge of ecclesiastical law, in acquaintance with the economy of the Church, in a knowledge of the details of its work, and in the extent of his travels and supervision, he has not been surpassed. He gave the Church fitty years of uninterrupted service; of active, eminently practical, efficient service. His life will stand out boldly in the history of the Church as one of massive toil and rigorous execution of great tasks. His name and services are known in all the Churches and have had world-wide recognition. But his work on earth is done. He will go in and out before us no more. It seems wellnigh impossible to realize that we have seen his face, heard his voice, and received his blessing for the last time. But we will praise the great Head of the Church for the long life and abundant work of his servant, we will cherish his memory, strive to imitate his excellences, and rejoice in the hope we have of meeting and greeting him in the great future.

Journal of the German Markence.

of the Herbonist Episopal Murch:
New York Hay 1-31, 1888

PP 571-580