FOSS, BISHOP CYRUS D. AND MRS. FOSS
In Memoriam: Bishop Foss.

From Addresses at the Funeral, February 1, 1910.

Address by Frank Mason North, D.D.

By the side of many soldier of the Cross who have been summoned to the rewards of battle, the fruits of service, Bishop Foss had said, "We are here to celebrate a coronation." It was his favorite approach to the mystery, which to-day we face. It was his joy, and how well I know it, was his joy to push farther apart the opening gates and point the broken horn to the virgin crown. Here we dare venture to repeat his own glorious thought: Here is not death but life. It is coronation! Let his own words thrill and lift us.

At the seminary reunion in 1893, in a somnolent vein, which was not unusual with him, he spoke of his boyhood. "It is a capital thing for a man to be well born the first time," he said, "I had that great good fortune. I was not a son of a millionaire, nor a king. I had a better start than that. I was the son of a hard-working, circuit-riding Methodist preacher who never had a salary of more than $400 a year at a time, who when obliged to give up his ministry bought a stone farm of thirty-two acres and sold his sons to work. Our father said if we would save our pennies and work studiously some of us might go to college. That was the brightest hope of my boyhood." Then that majestic mother, never to be forgotten by any who knew her, molded his boyhood. This Mother Foss, dignified, stately, unflinching, and at times unapproachable, strong-fathered in intellect, in spiritual insight penetrating, beloved and venerable. Just to recall to memory those whose lips have long been hushed is to declare how this boyhood was stimulated by right thinking, shot through and through with the golden light of the Spirit.

Then came college and associations, which only death has broken or can break. He graduated in 1854. Some were living who could tell of those college days. Thompson H. Landon, the two Warrens (the bishop and the President), Charles H. Payne, Edward G. Andrews, Albert D. Yell, and Albert S. Hunt. Some could recount his social life, but that strange, sacred spirit of God, Albert Hunt, should speak of his spiritual crises. To this one thing he was wont to say when he told of his conversion, doubt, he owed his freedom. With his new learning and his new life he left the halls of the university for the highways of service.

To the president's office in Wesleyan University Dr. Foss brought a richly furnished mind, but with it a preacher's heart, a pastor's concern for souls. It was delightful and refreshing to perceive how quickly men who were solicitors for the university's student in intellectual scholarship were caught up in his enthusiasm for a more spiritual life, how strongly he grasped and guided the personal side of life, how closely he held the affection of faculty and students, his fine hand on the memory and heart. But he was fair, far more than administrator, more even than personal partner, he is felt to be the embodiment, gracious and masterful of those spiritual traditions in religion and college which undergird the life of institutions and men. His contribution to Wesleyan was not his money, his scholarship, his gifts of eloquence, but himself.

In personality, in vision, in the divine presence was the quality of his power during nineteen years of pastoral work. By his preaching and teaching a new spirit was drawn into Christ. Just as the lines of his form and figure were strongly defined, so there was no shading at the edges of his character. However Judicial in his methods he was ever positive in his opinions. He was too sure of what he knew to be very tolerant with those to whom the atmosphere seemed smoky; yet where patient inquiry touched foundations which were to him immovable, when he deemed the investigation honest, his mind was open and unstinted. Ethically he was a stabilizer; he was not a moral opportunist. Rightness was to him so unyielding a value that he risked it in his own conduct and that of others. To be consistent in asking when a principle was involved would have been to him an extreme duty.

Address by Bishop Wilson.

Nearly twenty-two years have passed since Bishop Foss assumed the responsibilities of resident bishop in Philadelphia. What other word can I say than this, that in those years the life traditions of episcopal character and service had not been marred and the standards have not been lowered. Bishop Foss has won the light ofpressed place with the newest and the best. In the pulpit of all the churches in the city in which he preached, and if there was with him any presentation of Churches great and small, of conservatives important and outspoken, there was no indication of it in the message which he brought, for that message was always one which honored the Lord, defended the foundations of the faith, exalted the Christ, awakened and intensified aspirations to be like his Lord, a message of great thoughts which glowed through luminous and often radiant speech.

In the details of all the work here be offered with such commendation as facilitated wise plans and enriched every worthy enterprise. He was a leader in the dreamer in any sense; he was a planner working out the conclusions with all the light that could be gotten, and he held his impulses in check. But for the part he did his intellectual processes justified themselves in the issues. He recognized the fact that in such a city as this with its heterogeneous population and the problems occasioned by poverty and sin that a city missionary society would be a power. He gave himself to the task of developing such an institution as might adequately grapple with such a problem, and it is in no small measure due to the thought and labor that he bestowed upon it that that society has done such effective work.

When he came to the presidency of the Board of Church Extension, no one could doubt his attitude toward the cause of foreign missions. From his trips abroad he returned with interest intensified and zeal aflame, but there was never a withholding of sympathy when the problems of the homeland came before him. When by the division of the missionary work by Methodism the interests of the whole field were bound in Church extension and the new board was formed, the presence of Bishop Foss was a distinct addition, a prince and prominent, and so very prominent in his surveys of the field that his counsel was always of peculiar value.

Philadelphia was not only the field to which Bishop Foss gave the cultivation of his life, but it was the scene of that rare achievement where zeal for a great cause survives the interest of efficient leadership. To those who have come to this city with its problems and divisions and who have trod in the presence of such responsibility, to those, his successors, Bishop Foss gave always the right hand of a brother, a loving friend, and the strength of a great benefactor. One who has looked upon the indescribable wonders of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado knows there are at least five views, one from the brim, one from the floor of the canyon, one from the top, one from the height, one from the depth, the vision of the mountain and of the valley. The secret of that great physical weakness come at length with such alternation of hope and despair, was faith. A strong and more triumphant faith, so faith that became a dreamer in the Christ and to him the Holy Spirit was both God and sanctifier, his power to endure and overcome was the power given him of God.

Address by Bishop McDowell.

Christian education is one of his passions, Christian experience his pride. It returns to back to the older days to roam that religious, spiritual church in which he related its experience during his episcopal life, the long weeks of the time that was to be lost. In 1861 as a young preacher visiting the General Conference held in this city, I sat in one of the sessions, I think it must have been, and heard and saw Bishop Foss for the first time. He told not what he had been to God but what God had been to him. He heard that story repeated on that diamond day—what was the day called? I heard this man standing here, this man whom some have thought to be cold and reserved and unfeeling. I heard him tell how on that day he said to his physician that 'whisper, let
As I knew him.

Rev. John Williams, D.D.

Allow me to lay a little tribute on the grave of my former friend and pastor, the late Bishop Foss. I had a personal acquaintance with him when he was assigned to his brother's church in St. Paul's Episcopal Church, New York, but became more intimate with him when he became pastor of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of which I was a member. I was under his blessed ministry there for three years (the pastoral tenure), and drank spiritual wisdom from his lips. I was during his administration here that I received the new license to preach in 1888. He presided at one session of the South Kansas Conference, at which I was then a member, and I prepared our former acquaintance. He told me that old Trinity, New York, had given six young men to the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and he modestly averred with me that his ministry was surely responsible for it. He was a fine, thoughtful preacher, a most excellent pastor, and a social and cultured gentleman that no man and no pope is pissing away and Bishop Foss has come to join his associates, Bishop Kemper, Foster, and Goodell, and Dr. Halperz, and others who were prominent in New York pulps when I was a young man and a young Christian. The boll of heaven ring when such as they enter.

Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, who had been a number of times for thirty-two years as a teacher and principal in Western University and the Western University School, died at the age of forty-nine. He had been ill of kidney disease for many weeks. Mr. Foss was a son of the late Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, and was born in New York, March 15, 1859. He was graduated at Western University in 1880 and was ordained to the ministry of the Methodist Church at the age of twenty-one. He was an ardent student of the New Testament and was a member of the Board of the Western University School. He died quietly at his home on the 1st of July, 1919.

Born in Alma, Michigan, in 1859, he was the son of Calvin and Susan Foss. He passed away quietly on the morning of July 1st, leaving behind a wife and three children: Calvin, Cyrus, and Susan. He was a man of great talent and a fine scholar, and his death is deeply felt by all who knew him.}

The New Convent Hall

On the afternoon of January 30, the cornerstone of the New Convent Hall in Rome, Italy, was laid. The weather was very fine for the occasion. The day was clear, with a bright sky, bright sunshine, and a temperature which permitted a hundred and fifty Indians and about twenty Americans to sit out of doors, and be perfectly comfortable for more than an hour, during all the very interesting exercises. The services were in charge of Dr. W. H. Clark, the superintendent of the Mediterranean Mission, and the president of the Sociological Society of the Methodist Church in Rome. The cornerstone was laid by Bishop Foss, who was hallowed to the Church by the late Bishop Foss, and the Bishop of the Diocese of Western University, who was present at the ceremony.

The Bishop of the Western University, who was present at the ceremony, said this tribute to him:

"I am glad to have the opportunity of expressing my appreciation of the character of Bishop Charles D. Foss, and the Bishop of the Diocese of the Western University, who was present at the ceremony. He was a man of high character and a fine scholar, and his death is deeply felt by all who knew him."

Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, who had been a number of times, separated by considerable intervals, so near death's door that his life was despaired of, nevertheless lived seventy-six years to serve the church and bless the world. He passed quietly away from earth on Saturday evening, January 23. Since the beginning of his last illness Mrs. Foss had been constantly at his side, and when the end came his son, Cyrus D. Foss, Jr., and youngest daughter, Helen (Mrs. George H. Wood) were also with him. The funeral services were held at Arch Street church, Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon, February 3. Though Bishop Foss had retired from the active exercises of his episcopal office, and though the church had been prepared for the news of his death so that it did not come as a shock, yet the tidings were read with a sense of loss to the whole church, and of personal sorrow to many.

Cyrus David Foss was born in Kingston, Ulster county, New York, January 17, 1834. He was the son of Cyrus and Jane (Campbell) Foss. Like Bishop Goodsell, he was the child of a Methodist preacher; his father was a member of the New York Conference, and was also the first two brothers who lived to manhood. Archbishop Campbell Foss and William Jay Foss, both of whom are now deceased, were prepared for college at Annin Seminary, Amin, N. Y., and graduated at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., in 1854, with the highest honors. After his graduation he was leader of mathematics in Amin Seminary, and in 1856 was principal of the same institution. In 1857 he united with the New York conference, and from that time until 1879 he was pastor in the New York and New York East Conferences, serving in the leading churches of New York City and Brooklyn. His ministry in those prominent churches was characterized by evangelical fervor, as well as spiritual ability. The hearers who listened to the words which he uttered for their Salvation and spiritual growth, felt as though to hear some new thing. Retirements were prominent, the membership was increased, and, of course, every material interest of the churches was cared for. During the Civil War the voice of this young Methodist preacher was raised up in its behalf. The patriotic addresses and addresses offered the community and the government testimonials on the part of the young men. Though he had many flattering offers to leave the pastorate, none of them were present enough to draw him away from a work so near to his heart, until the imperative call came from his Alma Mater to assume the duties and honors of the presidency of Wesleyan University in 1877. Of his work there one who was associated with him has made this record.

"The two years which preceded his presidency of the University were years of great growth and change. Annual dinners had become an important feature of the University, and the college had become more and more a part of the whole country was attending. Annual expenses were more than twice the amount of annual income. The college was large, and the facilities for study were better than any other in the country. The president that time was a large man, with a firm grasp on the institutions with which he was associated. When the college was placed in the hands of Bishop Foss, he had been shown the work, and he was as much in the college institution as in the church institution. The New Century was at the time being written for the New Century, and the subject was a very prominent one in the college. The people of the city and the church were very much interested in the college. Bishop Foss was president of the college, and he was called to this position by the College Board, and the board voted to give him the presidency. Bishop Foss was a man of great ability, and he was well fitted for the position. He was a man of great ability, and he was well fitted for the position. He was a man of great ability, and he was well fitted for the position. He was a man of great ability, and he was well fitted for the position. The New Century

The New Century is a weekly newspaper, published in New York City, which was established in 1881. It was founded by Charles L. Mellen, a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopcal Church. The newspaper was started as a weekly publication, and it soon became one of the leading newspapers in the United States. It was known for its liberal and progressive editorial stance, and it was a major source of news and information for many years. The New Century was one of the most influential newspapers in the United States during the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Introduction

The Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church selected the Rev. Bishop Cyril D. Foss, D.D., LL.D., the Resident Bishop of Philadelphia, to visit officially the missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India and Malaysia. In pursuance of this appointment Bishop Foss started on his tour in the month of October, 1897, and returned in April, 1898.

During his stay in India the bubonic plague continued its ravages among the people of that empire, but the Bishop passed through the dangers, endured the fatigue, and, in good health, completed his work.

In view of his expected return to Philadelphia, the Preachers' Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the City of Philadelphia and vicinity, appointed a Committee to extend a welcome to the Bishop.

The Committee was composed of the following ministers: T. B. Neely, J. S. J. McConnell, S. W. Gehrels, S. W. Thomas, F. B. Lynch, T. C. Murphy, J. G. Bickerton, J. S. Hughes, J. R. T. Gray, W. L. McDowell, and W. W. Ramsay.

The Philadelphia Laymen's Association appointed the following Laymen as a Committee to act in conjunction with the Committee from the Preachers' Meeting: C. C. Hancock, John Hase, John E. James, Arthur M. Barson, Clarence D. Antrim, William H. Hevel, Robert E. Pattison, Charles Scott, J. W. Bouchin, F. W. Zollin, and Avery D. Harrington. The Combined Committee met and organized by electing the Rev. T. B. Neely, J.D., LL.D. Chairman, and the Rev. T. B. Lynch, D.D., Secretary.

The Committee decided to give Bishop Foss a public reception in the Arch Street Methodist Episcopal Church, on Thursday evening, the twenty-first of April. It adopted a written address to be delivered by the Rev. Dr. T. B. Neely, and ordered a special printing of the Program.

Opening Remarks—

In opening the meeting Dr. Ramsay said:

"We have come from all parts of this great city that as ministers and members of its more than one hundred Methodist churches we may manifest our devout gratitude to our Heavenly Father for the kindly providence which has returned to his home and friends, after his circuit of the globe, our greatly loved Bishop Foss, to whom we would extend a cordial welcome and cheerful greeting."

Prayer—

By Rev. T. C. Murphey, D. D.

A PRAYER FOR THE NATION.

Dr. Murphey offered a prayer, in which he besought the blessing of God upon the country in the midst of its present anxieties and perplexities. "O Lord God Almighty," he said, in part, "Thou art the all-wise, the all-mighty, and we plead with Thee for peace. Thou understandest the condition of our nation, and the condition of the neighboring nation, and the nature of their differences. We earnestly pray for Thy divine interposition. But if it is necessary that war should prevail, we beseech Thee for mercy. Grant wisdom to the President of the United States and a clear and true perception of the difficulties which beset his course; and moral courage for his duties. Bless his counsellors. Bless our soldiers and sailors. May God prepare them for whatever may be awaiting them in the future." Dr. Murphey closed his prayer with a reference to Bishop Foss and the occasion which had brought the large congregation together.

Address of Welcome
The formal address of welcome, read by Dr. Neely is as follows:

To the Reverend Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, D. D., LL. D.

Greeting: "Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ."

The undersigned Committee of the ministers and laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, voicing the sentiments of the clergy and the churches in Philadelphia and vicinity, desire to extend to you a cordial welcome on your return from your episcopal visitation to the missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the vast empire of India and Malaysia.

For almost ten years you have been the Bishop of our denomination resident in the City of Philadelphia, and, during these years, the Church has respected and honored you not only for your high office, but also for what you were and are in yourself and for the noble work you have done in the pulpit, and in the various executive departments of church activity.

Your lofty Christian character and your manifested interest in the affairs of our denomination in this great City and in its immediate vicinity, while at the same time you were occupied with the presidency of other and widely scattered conferences and with the general work of the denomination in this and other lands, has greatly impressed us, and your sympathy manifested toward individuals in time of sickness or other calamity has steadily strengthened the feeling that you were one of us as well as one with us.

When last October, under appointment of the Board of Bishops, you started from this City on your long journey to distant India, you were followed by the fervent prayers of preachers and people of our churches that you might have a safe journey, and that having discharged your episcopal duties in that extensive field, you might be brought back to us in health and strength.

During the period of your absence, which covered more than six months, you have traveled many miles by sea and by land. You have stood the strain of the gales and the storms; you have traveled as many miles as more than equal the circuit of the earth. Notwithstanding the perils by sea and the dangers by land, and the fact that your duties carried you through a great section where a terrible epidemic was raging, yet through a Glorious Providence you have been kept in health and strength, and now that you have returned after this long journey of thirty-three thousand miles, and this long absence, we greet and welcome you on your return, and come with thanksgivings to Almighty God that He has answered the many prayers that have been offered by our ministers and members, in that He has sustained you in the discharge of your episcopal duties, defended you from danger, and returned you to us in safety and in health.

In addition to this brief and formal address of welcome, we call your attention to this assemblage of preachers and people who have convened to-night to greet you and to extend to you their glad welcome, and these are but the representatives of the more than thirty-six thousand members and probationers in the one hundred and fifteen Methodist Episcopal Churches in the City of Philadelphia, to say nothing of those of adjoining sections.

One and all, both ministers and people, we welcome you, and pray that God may continue to bless you, that he may preserve your life and strength for many years, and that he may still make you a wise leader in the Church Militant and ultimately reward you in the Church Triumphant in heaven.

With great respect we present this address.

THE RESPONSE OF BISHOP FOSS.

Bishop Foss then arose and gave the following response and address on his recent travels; the audience rising and greeting him with the "Chautauqua Salute."
Mr. President and Christian Friends:

Before I utter a single word in glad and grateful acknowledgment of this very cordial and honorable address, I must be allowed to indulge my heart for an instant in recalling those beloved and lamented fellow-workers of ours who were with us last September and are not visibly present now. "They rest from their labors and their works do follow them," and our hearts follow them in high congratulation on the triumph which they have attained, and in solemn sadness on account of our sorrow.

Mr. President, I can find no words to utter the high appreciation which I feel in my heart of hearts for this welcome which has been so admirably voiced in the address of the Committee of Ministers and Laymen,—men whose I am glad to honor,—and who have had expression to my eyes in the presence of this great concourse, and in the smiling faces and gleaming eyes of this multitude of the pious Methodists, and other Christians as I perceive, of Philadelphia and its vicinity.

Some General Remarks.

Permit me, before addressing myself to the chief purpose of my standing here to-night and at your coming here to hear me, a few observations of a general sort such as would occur to any journal writer to matters which must assume the attention of every intelligent observer who travels widely in the East,—matters confessedly not of the highest moment, but of very curious and often of greatly delighted interest to men who have the opportunities which I have thus enjoyed.

In making the circuit of the earth I have traveled two thousand miles,—two thousand miles on almost all the seas and oceans in the north temperate and north polar zones, with no holidays, no storm at all until I had been six days on many seas that would three days and might a little a voyage to a landman, but nothing to a sailor, not an hour of fog, and not a minute of that ghastly cloud disturbance which makes the sea such a terror to multitudes of my fellow-men. On reaching Bombay I was launched at the outset with abundant knowledge concerning that great scourge which devastated that city and some other places in India in the winter of 1866; the plague. It is chiefly a winter disease; last summer it almost disappeared. When I was in Bombay in November and December the death-rate from the plague ranged from four to fourteen a day, touching no Europeans at all; in January and February it rapidly increased; and I have just received this week a letter from Bishop Tod and in which he states concerning it some particulars such as I have not lately seen in print, which I give you very briefly. The letter bears date Bombay, March 5th. He says: "I find all well, but the plague has not abated in the least. The deaths yesterday were 155; and the daily death-rate has been in the neighborhood of 200 for two weeks past. Europeans still escape, for the most part." So that, although the efforts to stamp out the plague have been partially successful, there is deep apprehension and fear that it may spread to other great cities in India on the eastern coast, whose filthy condition certainly invites it. No words can well express the admiration which the British Government and the India department of it deserve for their heroic efforts, with untinted use of money and of all available scientific skill, to limit, and, if possible, to destroy this awful scourge; and the same may be said of the efforts to relieve the famine, which had pretty much ceased when I reached India last November. A great many deaths have occurred during the winter as the indirect consequence of the famine, and the statements made by Mr. Julian Hawthorne in the "Cosmopolitan" magazine, which were so severely criticized, according to the best information I could get in India did not exaggerate the dreadful consequences of the famine.

British Rule in India.

I referred to the British Government. One of the marvels of history—one of the most striking series of events in it, in any generation and in any land, may be summed up in the phrase, "British Rule in India." How it came to pass that a nation having its chief seat of empire on a little island, on the west coast of Europe, should have been able to subjugate a territory as large as the United States set off the Mississippi River and to bring almost all the native races under its sway, and to hold down a population of two hundred and eighty million people and give them the best government by far that they have yet had and to do this with only eighty thousand British soldiers, and with British residents men, women, and children all put together, less than one hundred and ninety thousand,—surely this is one of the greatest marvels recorded in authentic history. It sounds like the wildest romance; but is the solid and magnificent achievement of one of the great governing and colonizing nations of the globe—bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh: and I want to add this, in this time when I will not say we greatly need (for any other reason than a sympathetic reason) the friendship of the mother country: I want to say this, that, traveling around the globe, I have met with Englishmen—a great many of them—of all ranks of society, several ears, more lords, officers of the army and navy and of the merchant marine, merchants and barristers, missionaries and their critics, clergymen and mechanics; and have talked with them or heard them talk; and I have not met a single Englishman, even in the freedom of the conversations on board vessels where we were together many days, which are sure to loosen men's tongues if anything can, I have not met a single Englishman who said in my hearing, at any time, any word concerning our country that was not a word of respect and friendship. [Applause.] And when, on board English ships, called to conduct religious services, I prayed in the same breath, more than once, for the Queen Empress of India, and for the President of the United States, the rustle of satisfaction and gladness amounted almost to applause; and I am sure you will all heartily join me in saying “God save the Queen” and “God bless Old England.” [Applause.]

Curious Things.

Among the curious things which I am to speak to you about, in a few words, in this introduction to the grand speech which is to come later, I cannot pass by the striking and very disgusting spectacles which I saw in Bombay, in the methods employed in disposing of the bodies of the dead, in the burning ghats and the Towns of Sikkim. Imagine, if you can anywhere outside the heathen world, a vast enclosure as large as one of the largest blocks in this city, surrounded by a stone wall fifteen feet in height and within it, every day fifteen, twenty, or one hundred corpses burned to ashes on separate piles of wood, right in the heart of the city—so that as you drive along the fine boulevards most disgusting smoke and odors offend your senses. The Towns of Silence, used by the Parsee only, are great circular walls twenty-five feet in height and one hundred feet in diameter, with low gratings near the bottom on which the ashes of the dead are kept while hundreds of vultures hover around in expectation, prance down upon them from their mast on the wall or from their flight in the sky, and in about ten minutes every particle of flesh is gone from the bones. From the windows of Bishop Thoburn's house I first made the acquaintance of the omnresent—friends (shall I say?) of humanity in India (because of their service as scavengers)—the crows: which gather by the thousand in the most populous quarters of all the larger cities of India—tens of thousands—with their perpetual “caw! caw!” so that you can scarcely hear another sound, morning and evening. They are not quite so big as our crows and wear a kind of light gray sash around their necks; they will come to the window ledge close by you, and leer at you and scold you and call you names till you get up and drive them away, and then come back in a few minutes and repeat the process until you really feel mean and wonder whether you are such a second-rate They snatch the bread and butter out of the hands of the children; they rob the coo going from the cook-house to the dining-room of the viétnals on the plate; in many ways they are a perpetual annoyance. But not more so than the monkeys in some of the cities of northern India, (which are more disgusting still), and are worse thieves, by far. Many a time a demure monkey, apparently asleep, only waits until some passer-by comes with food to their taste, carelessly carried, when, with a sudden stroke of his long hand, he will bring it all down upon the street, and twenty monkeys, which have been notified to be on hand, will at once grab it up and run away with it. Then there are the flying foxes, those enormous bats, of which I saw thousands flying over the parks in Lucknow and Cawnpore, weighing about one pound and a-half each, with the head, shoulders and body of a fox, as perfect as you can imagine, and with wings that spread four feet from tip to tip (measured some after they were dead). I will tell you of a more pleasing sight, the “pigeon orchid” of Malaya, an inch and a-half in length, whiter than the whitest lily, with the perfect form of a white pigeon with its two wings spread and its tail raised. The remarkable fact is that myriads of these blooms, which grow wild, come out once every month in the year in the torrid zone, absolutely on the same day—every one of those millions—and the next day they fade. And now, what is still more surprising, in the islands near by the same beautiful flower blossoms monthly in the same way every one on the island simultaneously, but on a different day from the blossoming day in Singapore.

No man can go to Konkan Bunder without being told that one of the greatest sights there is the working elephants. There are very great lumbering monsters in Konkan, I went to one of the large saw-mills where I saw men, working elephants, which carried the logs to the saws and brought away the slabs, then brought away the timbers and piled them up. I saw two of them piling bridge timbers thirty-five feet long, from sixteen to twenty-two inches square, weighing from two to three tons each: making them into piles twelve feet high, that were never touched by any human hands: but these heaps, with intelligence superior to that of many of the human naives of the country, under the direction of drivers sitting on their necks, raised the great timbers and slipped them to their places as deftly as you can imagine.

MISSIONARY PROGRESS.

Let me now address myself to the condition and progress of the Christian religion, and especially the Methodist type of it, in the British Empire in India. I wish first to make a general statement—a very brief one—and then to impress it upon your minds by a few vivid pictures. This is the total plan of what I shall now say: and I know that the rhetoricians would criticise me at once, some of them, for turning the subject round, and beginning where I ought to end, but I will tell you frankly: I am so sure that I can make good to you the thesis with which I begin this part of my remarks that I do not hesitate to tell you at the outset my deliberate conclusion on the subject of which I speak.

Now although I have some notes before me, you will see I am not going to read you an essay; these sheets are simply the chains by which I am trying to hold myself, so that I may not trespass unduly on your patience tonight. The collective judgment I have formed is about this, that Christianity, and the Methodist type of it, in India, have brought forth in this generation a volume of Christian evidences of greater value to the world than all the volumes of Christian evidences that can be gathered from the libraries of the theological seminaries of both hemispheres; that in our time, in the lifetime of the younger men here before me now, the Christian religion has so taken hold in the vast empire of India, among almost three hundred million people, as almost to enable the careful observer to see the very footprints of the ever-living Christ all over that land; and I shall hardly exaggerate my sense of the truth on this subject if I should add that if the too haggard church could but see a little more of the divine-human Jesus, his fresh footprints would be seen everywhere among the nations.

The difference between the two and the sight of such evidence of Christianity as I have had the privilege to witness in the recent months, is all the difference between reading a treatise on the expansive power of steam and walking the deck of a magnificent six thousand ton steamer plunging through the billows in the midst of the ocean and feeling the constant throb of its hot heart, until in twelve days it has crossed the great Pacific. I find not how, in any words which I have been able to frame with tongue or pen, to make any statement strong enough to raise my own burning conviction that the Lord Jesus Christ is taking India.

Call to mind, if you please, Judson in Burma, toiling, praying, fasting, hoping for many a weary year before he had a single convert, and Macnab similarly waiting in China: and then hear the facts which I am about to state, that only forty years ago, under appointment and advice of those two great missionary leaders of the church, both whose names are especially sacred in this City of Brotherly Love, John P. Durbin and Matthew Simpson, William Butler went out to plant Methodism in India: and then consider well what I now tell you: I wish these figures might be burned into your memory: that we now have in India and Malaya—seven-seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-three communicants of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of whom thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty were baptised within two years: one thousand two hundred and forty-nine schools, with thirty-one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine pupils: two thousand four hundred and eighty-five Sunday Schools, with eighty-three thousand two hundred and twenty-nine scholars: two hundred and nine Epworth Leagues with ten thousand three hundred and thirty-seven members: two hundred and twenty-six Foreign Missionaries, including the missionaries, their wives and the missionary teachers of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society; and native labourers in various ranks of employment, making a staff of three thousand five hundred and thirty-seven paid workers: and that the total value of the one church, school and other properties is three million six hundred and seven thousand nine hundred and eighty rupees.

SOLID FOUNDATIONS.

The foundations of our work in India have been broadly and solidly laid in both the great departments of missionary labor, the educational and the evangelical. Some missionary societies devote themselves almost exclusively to education, and the missionaries are little more than schoolmasters; some almost entirely to evangelistic work; our Church does both and does both strongly and well and makes the two operative with and reinforce each other. Some ten years ago when that little bunch of missionaries and evangelists, led by James E. Hamlin, went to the Missionary Episcopacy, began his first ton among the churches in America before he went out to India and Malaya he started the Church by saying that he hoped to live to see the day when there would be ten thousand converts under the care of our Church in India alone in a single year; and we heard it with wonder—some of us raising the question whether he was the wildest of fanatics or a courageous and veritable prophet of the living God. I am thankful to say that I was one of those who at the time chose the latter horn of this dilemma; the events of the last ten years have abundantly justified that belief, and instead of ten thousand there have been twelve thousand, thirteen thousand, one year eighteen thousand converts in a single year, brought to Christian baptism under the labors of our missionaries in India and Malaysia! And these numbers might be vastly augmented if only—as one of our native pastors said in my hearing—we could provide "holders up" of the converts, that is, plain, comparatively illiterate but genuinely converted, pastor teachers, who should train them in Christian knowledge and guard them against the temptations sure to assail them.

NAINI TAL.

I cannot get on with these chains. (And the Bishop flung his notes to the floor.) Let me show you one picture I have to draw. After only four days in Bombay, by a slow three days' journey on cars where you have to provide your own bed, bedding and towels,—I reached a beautiful spot among the mountains—themselves 6,000 feet above the level of the sea.—Naini Tal, which means the "Lake of the Godless Saint." It is a wonderful lake—I know of nothing in this country to suggest it, unless it be Lake Mohonk. Naini Tal is twice as green and ten times as big, and is surrounded by mountains 1,500 feet in height, on whose steep sides, embowered in the greenest foliage, are seen the elegant palatial homes of summer residents and English officials, and sanitary homes for missionaries, and Christian schools and churches. From one of the near heights I got my first glimpse of "The Snows,"—as they call them all over India,—a very diminutive name for the snow-clad Himalaya Mountains, and there I saw, one night before sunset, and the next morning at sunrise, sixty-three peaks—the highest of them 25,000 feet in height and the lowest, 20,000 feet. As the setting sun withdrew its rays from them one after another they seemed to withdraw themselves almost, and to turn into with a heap of gray ashes, as darkness quickly covered them; but out of it, the next morning, at break of day, they rose before my eyes in glorious resurrection and majestic state. It was a sight, never to be described but forgotten. But when I came down from that vision,— which can never be equaled for me in this world.—I had a still more profound impression. I had just seen, on a slope of the Himalayas the glacier from which one of the fountains of the Ganges rises forth! I then saw at Naini Tal a grander sight, the spot where William Fox had stood in God's name when he smote the rock of heathenism, and lo! India Methodism!—and the hill had become a river! For four days I was there, watching its wonderful flow, at a District Conference, in which were included an Epworth League meeting, a temperance meeting, and various other meetings. Some fifty native teachers and local preachers and stewards and class leaders were present, and also,—and I cannot mention it without a quick heart-beat,—one of the teachers of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society.—Miss Hudden, of Pithoraghat, with her forty-nine girls and women—native Christians, brought to Jesus largely by her instrumentality, whom she had led nine days' march over the rough mountain paths, twelve miles each day, carrying on their heads their tents and their food and their blankets—twenty-five pounds on the head of every woman,—ten pounds on the head of every girl,—nine days' march, to be with us four days in the center of our humble little church, and listen, and wait, and wait and listen, and sing and get blessings from God,—as they did in such abundance, and nine days back again over rough mountains and along weary marches to their work again. That was my first strong impression of the river flowing in India; but I stood on its banks in many other places, presently.

A CAMP-MEETING IN INDIA.

A short time after, with the Rev. Dr. Goucher, who was my constant attendant and helper in all this visitation, and with Bishop Thornburn, I spent four days at the Bulbars camp-meeting in northern India. At the railroad station we found a line of our native Christians and of our children from the schools, with a few of our American missionaries at the head of the line, drawn up on each side of the path, a third of a mile in length, to receive us with a band of native music, with the sound of fire-crackers and other excitement, and with holy songs, because we came as representatives of the great mother Church which had worked for its growth in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I am not able describe the scenes of those four days in words, that many others of those present during the meeting. We tried to get at the questions whether the converts were converted, and whether this was really Christianity that we saw, and the genuine Methodist type of it. In our daily attendance of the meetings we had interpreters sitting beside us to keep us posted. On the Sabbath morning several of the recent converts were baptized. There was among them an old gray-haired man who for many years had been a fakir, but had forsaken his idolatry, and was sitting at the feet of Jesus. When I was about to administer the rite of Holy Baptism to him, after he had been closely questioned by Bishop Thoburn, the old man, as his last break from idolatry, took off his rosary (I have it here) and cast it down at my feet as though to say, “My heathenism is at an end; tell my friends in America that my only trust is in the precious blood of the Lamb.” I prize this fine rosary, not only because of its intrinsic value, but because of its associations with the religious superstition of its pagan owner almost from his boyhood.

A HEATHEN MELA.

A few weeks later while attending one of our conferences—the Northwest India Conference—at Allahabad, I had the opportunity to visit one of the great heathen melas. A mela is any festival—generally a religious festival—and we have wisely adopted the word for our camp-meetings. This heathen mela is fixed at Allahabad for certain weeks of January and February every year: and tens of thousands of pilgrims (sometimes as many as ninety or a hundred thousand in a single day), from anywhere within fifty or a hundred miles, come with their blankets and with a little food, to bathe at the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna Rivers, the most sacred place in all India, believing that to bathe in those waters gives better promise of release from sin than anything else that they know of. Numberless thousands, I suppose, five, ten, or twenty thousand gather in a few hours. Between a great bluff on which the city is situated and the junction of those rivers, there is a vast stretch of sand, a mile and a quarter in width, traversed by sprinkled paths. On both sides of the broad avenue are many hundreds of beggars, the most filthy and disgusting you can conceive of, exposing every manner of physical deformities, ninetenths of which are simulated, and among them some—I think there were a hundred or more—“holy men,” as they call the fakirs—and I saw who had his left foot securely planted above his right knee and held there for years. His penance was so to twelve years standing on his right foot, with a little board under his breast and a cord attached to that fastened to a post behind him, supporting one-third of his weight. He was esteemed especially holy because for eleven years he had not had his left foot on the ground. Another had one arm extended particularly until it had grown as stiff as iron—could not by any possibility be brought down. Others were buried in dust so that nothing but the nose and mouth protruded, and every expiration of the breath blew a cloud of dust into the air. There were several on beds of spikes. One had been on his spike bed for five years; another for more than six; another for nine, twelve being the maximum penance.

Dr. Gouger, who was with me, is a great collector: somehow he is a sort of magnet to which things come. He came back from one of these beds of spikes with three or four of the spikes; he had tried to get the man lying on one of them to sell him some, but the answer was that he could not possibly do that. “Well,” said the doctor, “let me take some!” and catching the gleam of some copper coins in the doctor’s hands the devotee turned his head the other way while the doctor took some and gave him a handful of coins. The spikes are three inches in length, sharpened at both ends, driven into the head about an inch, and on several hundred such spikes the poor fellows lie until their callous backs and legs become somewhat acclimated to them; but it is a matter of twelve years, or else the thing is a failure. (Here is one of the spikes.) Do you think I can put into words the impressions which with I left that place after some hours of wandering about, concerning the disgusting and ruinous heathenism in which hundreds of millions of my fellow-countrymen are held in India? Beside the great pathway was a little booth in which four or five native preachers (two of whom understood English) were preaching the gospel, and I stopped and found one who could interpret for me. Presently there came up an old man: a little crowd gathered: he heard with them the singing, and then the plain preaching, and he put more and more question which the missionary would stop and answer. When the talking stopped there came a little hUl I had a half-hour’s chat with the old man through an interpreter. He had one of his sacred books wrapped up carefully, which he unwrapped and showed me, and read me something from it, and then he put it aside awhile. I noticed while he was talking to me he had his hand in this little bag—a prayer bag in which, with that book so hung to his mouth, and a place for his thumb, on easy and the breaths, so that he was able to read while at the same time, I should have what he was doing. When I am sitting on my bed—mostly in prayer—said Vandals, I was able to let me know; when this day, in other words, I was so well, and I gave him half a tupa of silver and told him I would be glad if he would take that and I would take his book, and he said it was no longer of any use to him. I pointed him to Jesus: and he listened to me and tried to upset me by quotations from his book; and then listened and listened and wanted to know more of my Master; and when my time was up and I arose to leave, and he gave me his hand, he said, "I will be your disciple." "O," I said, "I don't want you; I will turn you over to my Lord, Jesus Christ;" and I came on my way.

"RAW HEATHEN."

Look now at a very different picture, which I saw in the immediate vicinity of a little village called Bhagd, where two years and a-half before we had only fifteen converts, the overflow from Bombay—and that shows you how missions propagate themselves: you can't keep them in fences. We had a field assigned us in northern India—you might as well assign limits to the rising tide of the Atlantic Ocean as to assign a narrow field to James M. Thoburn and his fellow-missionaries and the Methodist Church anywhere on the face of the earth. John Wesley told an everlasting truth concerning it when he said: "The world is my parish." Well, pardon this Pauline digression!

Fifteen of these Gujarati converts from Bombay got up into the region of Baroda; of course our missionaries followed them, and in two and a-half years they had become fourteen hundred. I wish we had such access as that all over Philadelphia and Pennsylvania. The missionaries conformed a little coup meeting under the banana trees for Dr. Goncher, Bishop Thoburn and myself and to see these converts; we went there and found them gathered from scores of little villages. When I spoke of villages, I do not mean what you call a village here; I mean simply a little collection of mud huts—perhaps, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred of them—in which human beings live and from which they go forth to their daily toil in the fields. In villages of that sort, within twenty miles, those fourteen hundred Christians lived; and twelve hundred of them got out to see the American strangers; and they had a morning and afternoon of holy song and delightful addresses and the attending of Christian experiences and exhibition—and then in the afternoon, as soon as that was the close of the services, Dr. Goncher and I had the honor and pleasure to baptize two hundred and twenty-five persons mostly with converts including twenty-five of thirty children of converts; among them four or five years old; running around and playing in nothing except the brown silk, in which they were born. Bishop Thoburn strictly questioned all the adults before he baptized them. They were arranged in rows, sitting on the ground, and they were closely questioned somewhat thus: "Do you believe in one God?" "Do you believe in Jesus Christ?" "Do you forsake your idols—have you put away every token of idolatry?" "Will you forsake this and that and the other?" "Will you give up especially Ghul" which is the Hindustani word for the obscene abuse of your mother and your grandmother. They do not swear: their swearing is the obscenity of abusing each other's ancestors, and especially female ancestors: "Will you break away from all that and every other wicked thing?" And when they had answered many such searching questions I said to one of the missionaries: "Do these poor fellows and these poor women know anything about the Apostles' Creed?" He took the question forward and said: "Our American bishop wants to know whether you know anything about the Apostles' Creed;" and then said to the interpreter: "Ask them and let them try it;" and then those adults recited the Apostles' Creed from beginning to end better than I have ever heard it repeated in America, unless it was read from the book; and could have done the same with the 23d Psalm, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer. "Raw heathen," I have heard said of these people in Europe and in America. "Raw heathen." Yes, such they were; such they are. How then, did they come to know these things? Because for four or six months pastor teachers, converted men, knowing almost nothing but Jesus Christ, went through these villages every evening when the laborers came home from the fields and held village prayer services, in which the New Testament was read and plainly expounded, and the Apostles' Creed was taught, and the Lord's Prayer was taught, and the Ten Commandments were taught; so that I say although they had all been "raw heathen," when we visited them they wore pious Christian believers. I said to Dr. Parker—"you know his stately form and noble face and excellent work, many of you: if there had been a missionary Bishop elected by the last General Conference it would have been he;" said to him. "Dr. Parker, tell me frankly, when you thus win twenty, or one hundred, or two hundred of these raw heathen and baptize them, how many are lost after a few years?" He answered: "We have done that again and again and where the ten professions made for by these persons after a year or two years you will find exactly five percent of them every time with their backs toward the cross looking around lives and doing their best to live as the best"—"Raw heathens." God send us more of them, and send to the seven to strengthen and uphold them, and to present them at last before Him with exceeding joy.
I cannot speak fully now of the Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society, but must give you one brilliant picture of its work which must ever abide in my memory. I am bound to say that its representatives, no less than the missionaries sent out by the parent society, gave us perpetual opportunities for talk, talk, talk, with unlimited tea, tea, tea.

In Madras, the first morning, before we got through our Chata-bazir or little breakfast, (just simply a cup of tea and two very little bits of toast served before we got out of bed in the morning), a saintly lady who is in charge of the Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society in that city, sent us word that we must surely come over at 11 o’clock and see some of the work of her teachers: and there, in the humble missionary home in which she lives, we saw forty dainty little maidens of the higher classes of that city, sent at good prices for tuition to this school, because it is the best school to be found in Madras; and those little maidens were dressed in the finest silks that India could produce; and jewels—jewels,—they had jewels in the tops of their ears and in the bottoms of their ears: they had them in their noses; they had them on all the joints of their fingers and even on their thumbs, on their wrists and on their elbows and on their ankles and on their toes, so that they fairly jingled with jewels whenever they stirred; and they stirred a great deal, because they went through some very striking calisthenics and some very lively singing. Beside these, and somewhat younger, were, perhaps, twenty little girls without a jewel, in the plainest clothing—all except of silk, and necklaces and rings and bracelets, and other jewels—but at least they had an air of being dressed up in a way they might have been dressed up in a village for a wedding. There was also there that wonderful personage whose biography I wish every Christian before me might read, and that it might be in every Sunday School library and in every family in the United States—Soobomunnam Anjili—a high caste woman, with all her privileges and wealth of jewelry three years ago taught of Jesus in the Zemana until she wanted to come to him but how could she break away and leave her sons and brothers? But two years ago she came to Miss Stephens, sat herself down at her feet, and said “I am a Christian, present, and from this day she had broken utterly away from all her old connections. I saw her again and again, with no jewels—going forth daily into the Zemana, and to the squalling of floors and the hum of beds and the hum of work—a true, noble, consecrated saint—bound to get to the bottom of society, and if she can, also to the top of it, and to be a faithful missionary among her own people.

I saw also a Zemana woman who, until that day, had never seen the face of a white man—had seen no man’s face near at hand excepting the face of her husband and son and of the servants about her house: but having been converted some years ago, in a quiet way in the zemana, and having learned to love Jesus, she at last persuaded her husband (having laid by all her jewels) to let her come to that house, and see the little children, and hear them sing, and see these American strangers. She had holes in her ears almost as big as a copper cent—the lower lobe being as large as the upper, to hang large jewels there to please the eyes of her husband and her son. She sat there hardly daring to cast her eyes around; and yet she gathered courage, and when the meeting went on, and was almost over, with sweet voice she sang—"All the Way Along it is Jesus. The next day we held the cornerstone of the new orphanage which Miss Stephens is building. And now let me tell you a strange fact. The great pavilion in which we met, which was twice as large as this audience room, was adorned with beautiful tapestries and hangings. Flags were suspended along the main street of the city a half-mile each way, and lights at night along the same street for the same distance. Great bamboo towers were built, fifty feet high, hung round in the evening with hundreds of lights, and all this was done by a native heathen gentleman, because he had come to believe that this school work which these blessed Christian women are doing is philanthropic and excellent work. This high government official this solid merchant and man of wealth, did all this with a cheerful heart, as a kind of unconscious testimony on his own part to the way in which the kings of the world, and the wealth of the world, and the wealth of the world when Bithiah’s splendid visions are fulfilled are to be brought and laid at Jesus’ feet. One-third of the pavilion was shut off by a curtain behind which were three hundred Zemana women who, until that day, had never been out into the world and seen the faces of white men; and we noticed, as the exercises of speech and song went on that the bamboo curtain was raised, and white hands were laid on those behind the curtain, and we were told that the mission society had found a Christian Mr. F. A. A., who had done all this work of preparation, and now was preparing others. Miss Stephens nothing in the way of expense that she except to pay for the cornerstone itself, took us there to that curtain and introduced us to his wife, who shrank and drew back as though from pollution, and yet she taught the white man’s hand, as did a few others of..."
the women there. We saw the bright-eyed, saintly Sooboongsam Ammal moving around among them, getting the frowns of some and the indifferent greetings of others, and the wondering looks of many. They knew what she had left; and only a few months before had had a great public meeting for the reproof of the rich woman who could break her estate and leave her friends and have her funeral publicly celebrated by them before she died. O, my friends! do not such facts open a rift into darkest India?

MAGNIFICENT OPPORTUNITIES.

Now let me add, if only our beloved church were able, (nay, we are able), were so awake as to be willing to lay such gifts on the altar of the Foreign Missionary Society, that we might add twenty-five per cent. only for the work in India next year, and as much the year after, I tell you my sober conviction, (which is as clear as anything which I have profoundly studied and about which I know the facts), we might double the number of our communicants and pupils, and our influence for good, in India, in forty-eight months; and in the early years of the century to come, if the dear Lord shall only give us reserved energies of the Holy Spirit, for which my praying heart often lays claim in humble faith—in the opening years of the coming century I see nothing to prevent a million converts in India in a decade. The people are forsaking the old religions and are converted with them. The British Government carries with it around the globe the Bible, and Protestant Christianity, and the form of sound words in the English language; and is a savor of good on these lines: and I, for one, am glad and grateful for this influence of the nation from which we spring.

THE GOUCHER SCHOOLS.

A final word—I beg your pardon for detaining you so long—a final word. I have said that my traveling companion in this long tour was Rev. Dr. Goucher, President of the Woman's College of Baltimore. Many of you may not have known until you saw my account of it in our church papers recently that for fifteen years Dr. Goucher had been supporting more than a hundred primary village schools in India, at an aggregate cost of more than a hundred thousand dollars a year to get a Christian teacher. These schools have spread out into a fine, high school in Mornadale, for both girls and boys. Will you take this sober statement and put it into your memories? These schools have educated pastors and presiding elders and pastor-teachers and local preachers and day-school teachers, through whose influence, as the reports of the presiding elders distinctly show, in these fifteen years 27,000 converts have been added to our church. That is the sort of school we believe in. I met a minister of another branch of the Christian Church—I will not name it—I do not mean to criticize it—every church must judge for itself—who had been, with six other university graduates for about fifteen years teaching a great school with a college course in it; and now it has six hundred pupils. I heard him say that in all those fifteen years he was not aware that a single one of those students had been converted. Our beloved church in every land believes that when the Lord Jesus Christ said, "Go ye, teach all nations," He did not mean simply to send out schoolmasters; because, in another form of that same commission, it runs, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature:" and so our teachers are missionaries and our missionaries are teachers; their prayers and their lessons and their love for souls all work together; they lead their pupils to Christ.

I will not take time to tell of the awful famine; that dreadful scourge of India was made directly the means of putting under our care thousands of children and young women; and many who a year ago were immersed in heathenism and ready to perish for lack of bread, under our care have within one year been taught and converted and brought to a happy Christian life; and we see how the great power of God is able to bring good out of evil.

HOME AGAIN.

I am glad to be back again. I am glad to have rested for three weeks in flowery Japan; I am glad to say that on the last Sunday I spent in Tokio, riding six miles through a fierce rain in a little narrow jinrikisha, with two bare-legged Japanese to draw me—when I got to the little church in a heavy rain I found one hundred and thirty native Japanese, and through an interpreter preached to them the simplest gospel I could command, and, having closed, I sat down; but, during the singing said to myself, "Why didn't you the other day when the Japanese are bought and paid to put their heads into the water?" and a certain idea made me imagine that they had wanted to be a Christian, and so I sang the little hymn, "I love you Lord, I love to see thee near;" and I invited any who wished to come to Christ to rise and stand, seven of them—five young men, some of whom are students in the Imperial University, and two middle-aged women. Then I asked them to stand, and the sun was shining down on the"
the simple way of faith. And somehow or other, I felt as though my license to preach had been renewed; and I am ready to go around the globe again if only I may be God's voice to bring seven sinners—especially seven heathen sinners—to the mercy-seat. I am very glad to be back here. "There's no place like home;" and, next after that dear spot where your wife and children are, there is no place like a great Christian community in which you also bow up against like-minded, hearty, sympathetic fellow-workers in the kingdom of Jesus Christ. I am back again. How long I shall be back I cannot tell. You speak your word of welcome; I thank you; it shows that you cordially appreciate my return; though, as one of the wide-ranging itinerants of the church, I cannot command very much time in the city I love so well. Next after my official duties I am here again to lend a hand of help to our City Missionary and Church Extension Society, of which I am one of the officers. I am here to help Methodists in Philadelphia to understand a little better how much they need, for their own sakes, a good strong Christian school for their girls; I am here to resume my place among the managers of our general Board of Church Extension. I am here to lend at least a heart of sympathy to our local Methodist philanthropic institutions and to our numerous churches. I cannot be with you constantly. I am here and there and everywhere on my official errands.

I hope to run with you a little longer in this pilgrim path, and trust that through God's infinite mercy we shall meet at length on the golden streets with our loved and lamented ones at the right hand of the Father, and cast our starry crowns at our enthroned Redeemer's feet with immortal rapture.

At the conclusion of Bishop Foss' address, the audience individually engaged in a warm handshaking with the honored guest of the evening.
BISHOP FOSS WELcomed

A Cordial Reception to Celebrate His Return From India.

CLERGY AND LAYMEN AS HOSTS

Dr. Foss Gives an Interesting Account of Work Being Done in India by Methodist Episcopal Missionaries.

As a welcome home after his travels in India, Rev. Cyrus D. Foss, Methodist Episcopal Bishop of Philadelphia, was given a hearty reception by the clergy and laity of the churches of this city at the Arch Street M. E. Church, Broad and Arch Streets, last night. The edifice, crowned with a new, unobstructed, covered pulpit and fitted up to the top with electric gas, and above it, two large American flags, was draped.

The Bishop had concluded his address when the audience sang, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" and then a large number of people extended a personal welcome to the Bishop.

Bishop Cyrus D. Foss is a native of Kingston, N. Y., and was born January 17, 1834. He was converted in 1852, and soon became convinced of a call to the ministry. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1854, and spent three years in Amonia Seminary as professor and principal. In 1857 he entered the New York Conference, and two years later was transferred to the New York East Conference and appointed to Fleet Street, Brooklyn. From this time he occupied many pulpit in New York and Brooklyn, and in 1877 was re-transferred to New York Conference, with which body he was identified in 1878, when he was elected President of Wesleyan University. A remarkable degree of prosperity attended the University during his supervision, so that the endowment fund advanced to grand proportions. His eminent qualifications for administration of the Church's pecuniary interests were further recognized by the General Conference of 1877, by which body he was elected to the episcopacy.

Bishop Foss was married in 1857, to Miss Mary
